There are hundreds of videos and streams on YouTube regarding various facets of Counter-Strike. Community support The Counter-Strike community is very large, with various organized subcommunities. As with many games, there are many forums, chats, and community-run websites. Popular websites include user-run Wiki sites, community blogs, and community-run gaming media websites. The community was active in the previous development cycle, however, the focus shifted towards the game's next development cycle. The community currently concentrates around Counter-Strike: Global Offensive. Counter-Strike in non-English speaking countries The Czech language version of Counter-Strike, Česká mýra, and the Slovak language version of Counter-Strike, Štajersko, are developed and published by Valve. In 1997, Valve employee Mark Kington was in Prague for the first Counter-Strike LAN game tournament in Europe. The event, including several thousand players from over 35 nations, was the first official European tournament held by Valve. The tournament and tournament organized tournaments have been held regularly in Prague since that time, and two other Valve-sponsored tournaments, both held in the Czech Republic, have been held: the Czech National Championships in 2003, and The Best of 8 Prague hosted in 2006. Counter-Strike has also been a major eSports event in Hong Kong, and has a large player base in South Korea. Reception Counter-Strike has received critical acclaim. In its 1997 demo, PC Gamer included the game in its "Hall of Fame", writing: "The only game on the market that really uses a mouse, Counter-Strike is an addictive, action-packed arena shooter with absolutely no learning curve." Sales According to Valve, CS:S sold 3 million copies during its first month of release in the United States, placing the game as the 13th best-selling computer game of all time. After the first six months of sales, Valve estimated that CS had sold over 16 million copies. As of 2008, Counter-Strike is estimated to have sold approximately 50 million copies. In 2004, GameSpot placed Counter-Strike in their top 10 games of all time.
